

The latest podcast

Published: May 30, 2026, 6:18 am

I am aware that many people here seem to have enjoyed the podcast discussions that John Christensen and I have had over the last 6 to 9 months on my YouTube channel.

Unfortunately, the YouTube algorithm has not liked these and other podcasts we have made. Lacking in its own imagination, that algorithm rewards consistency, and when we post a podcast that is around 45 minutes long, it sees something inconsistent with our average 12-minute video, and then it not only does not promote it as a consequence, but it actively punishes us for the next few days by not promoting the videos that follow as well. This has been, to be polite, deeply frustrating.

However, creating a Substack channel provides us with an alternative platform for publishing video outside the YouTube framework. In fact, achieving that goal was one of the reasons for creating that Substack channel.

As a result, John and I are restarting our conversations, and I hope that in due course, Steve Keen and I might do so as well, and that others might get involved too. You never know, I might even persuade Jacqueline to get in front of a camera, because in many ways she would be my ideal podcast guest, because she has such an interesting perspective on the world.

All this being said, you can find my latest conversation with John, and a summary of it, on my Substack channel this morning, here. No subscription of any sort is required. The channel is free. You just have to click the link. That is all there is to it, and please note, this is the first in a series that John and I are planning to explore our concerns around the environment, neoliberalism, our campaigning on these issues, and how we think discussion in this area should develop.