

Recuoeration

Published: July 3, 2026, 7:10 am

I would like to write more this morning. There are, in fact, two quite big posts sitting in draft. They will have to wait. Neither is time-critical. I have to face reality.

I have managed a week of fairly normal output, following a week when I spent most of my time either in deep pain or in hospital, and I have not, despite all the advice offered, probably spent enough time recuperating.

There are videos to edit this morning, some admin to deal with, and then I perhaps do need to take things relatively quietly for the weekend, although at least one of those back-burner pieces might make an appearance.

I have appreciated all the messages of goodwill over the last week or so, but as Steve Keen and I agreed in a discussion this week, we both feel driven by the scale of the crisis the world's economy, its democracy, and its environment face. As a consequence, we are both taking a decidedly unusual approach to retirement by maybe working harder than we ever have. The only reason is that we feel the crisis is so overwhelming that answers are needed as soon as possible.

But I also need a relatively quiet weekend. Thank you for your support.