

The infographics: now available to download

Published: August 6, 2026, 6:23 am

I have, for the last week or two, been saying that we will produce a download section for our infographics. I finally found the time to prepare this whilst watching cricket on BBC Two over the last couple of evenings.

The link is within the sidebar (or bottom bar, if you are reading this on a mobile device) on all our blog posts and is labelled Infographics (which I have highlighted here):

Click it to go to our infographic download section. There, you will find that over 20 infographics are now available. Some more will be added soon, but some of the early ones do need improvement before I post them here.

As usual, and as with all downloads, these are free. The only reason we ask for your email address before downloading them is that if you wish to make a donation, which is an option that we make available, we need your address to be able to say thank you. We make no other use of it.

Any feedback or comment, either in general or on a particular download, would be appreciated. I've tried to make sure these print well up to at least A4 size, but if there is any problem, please tell me.

One final point: I have not included in the download list those infographics produced for specific current purposes that I doubt will have enduring value. Please let me know if you think that is an error on my part, and I will add them as well if the arguments to do so are persuasive, but please do remember that there may be more than 100 infographics on this list before I finish, and I do not want quantity for the sake of it.