Time off

I took time to breathe deeply, look at the world, and think hard today.

In this morning's deep fog, Jacqueline and I had coffee near the Cathedral and discussed an interview I am doing next week. More on that another time.

This afternoon, the fog had lifted, and we were at Welney, which offered great birdwatching.

This is the River Ouse (which is canalised here), looking south.

And this is one of the northern hides across the fen in light afternoon sun. A barn owl had just flown over.

The pylon in the background is a legacy from my father. He was a transmission engineer and designed that power line across the fens.
