The UK is turning its back on Farage

The welcome news from the USA overnight was that it had turned its back on Donald Trump.

Closer to home, there is further welcome news, this time from the latest FT poll tracker, which indicates that the current support for parties in the UK might be as follows:

The Burnham bounce is continuing. This is coming at the expense of the Greens. What is more interesting, however, is that for the first time in nearly two years the Conservatives are ahead of Reform.

Let me be clear: I have no love for either of these parties, both of which I consider to be racist and profoundly prejudiced against the interests of the majority of the people of the UK. However, the fact that the neofascism of Reform is being rejected by almost all groups within UK society, except for those above 50, and men in particular, is very welcome news. Long made the trend continue.

As I noted in this morning's video, Gen Z are leading a political transformation in many countries around the world. I look forward to that happening here, and to their parents listening. The time for change has arrived. Neither the Tories nor reform do in any way offer anything to that generation, but if young people can lead the swing in opinion against fascism, they will be doing a fantastic job.
